and their passengers at risk. Even a seemingly-minor fender-bender can lead to financial ruin due to legal suits, damages, and lingering, long-term injuries.

To put this in context, registered taxi drivers must, by law, carry comprehensive commercial insurance policies. But commercial policies are expensive and not a feasible option for the part-time ridesharing driver.

But there IS good news. Aviva Canada now offers personal coverage for ridesharing drivers. This is excellent news for ridesharing drivers –and their passengers. Currently, Aviva Canada is the only company that offers ridesharing coverage, but it is certain that other insurance groups will be following Aviva's lead in the future. In the meantime, anyone who is considering joining the ridesharing movement would be wise to talk to their insurance broker about available coverage options before taking the wheel.

Understanding the Financial Risks of Ridesharing

Ridesharing--made popular by digital network transportation companies like Uber -- is a relatively new phenomenon that is rapidly growing in popularity. Individuals use their own private vehicles to transport paying passengers. An app, like Uber, connects available drivers with people needing rides. Since its launch in 2014, Uber has already contracted 16,000 drivers in the GTA alone. Across the country, Canadians take more than a million rides a month from thousands of Uber drivers. And new ridesharing companies are popping up all the time.

The concept is simple. Share your ride and earn a little extra income on the side. Seems like easy money. But is the financial risk worth the financial gain?

The fact is, as soon as you start charging for your driving services, your private auto insurance policy may be deemed VOID, leaving you exposed to huge repair bills, liability claims, law suits, and settlement fees in the event of an accident.

Many of the ridesharing drivers on the road today are driving with major gaps in their insurance coverage, putting both themselves
